ARTHUR GRIFFITH, FREE STATE CHIEF. DIES IN PRIEST'S ARMS

Succumbs to Heart Attack as Last Sparks of Rebellion Are Stamped Out.

DUBLIN, Aug. 12.—Arthur Griffith, the greatest figure of the Irish Free State, died today as the last sparks of the rebellion against the government which he set up were being stamped out.

On the eve of seeing the Irish Free State, for which he had given the time of his death, that held together the opposing factions in the Irish Free State. It was feared tonight that Griffith's death would be a most serious blow to the Free State as it was his sane leadership that maintained unity. He was known as the very foundation of the government.

On the eve of seeing the Irish Free State, for which he had given his best efforts, firmly established with the final defeat of the rebel forces, Griffith died of heart attack forces, Griffith died of heart attack in the arms of a weeping priest.

Just as he died, the news was coming in that the last of the rebei in Cork had surrendered, and that the remnants of the insurgent forces were being hunted down by Free State troops. A few hours before his death the rebeis made their last effort to launch another urrising in Dublin by the capture of the post office, but it was easily suppressed by troops of Griffith's government.
